

If they pass laws requiring commercial VOIP carriers to require easy tapping by the government this will increase the burden on private telecom companies offering services. Not only will they have to weaken their security to allow tapping, which lowers the value I get for my money, but they also have to support the costs of managing the access, so I have to pay more as well. What this will actually do is push society towards decentralized instant messaging based Voip, which cannot be regulated, taxed, or tapped.

Just so long as you are aware of the effects.
